Hacking Medeco locks

A presentation at the Last HOPE hacker conference focuses on the undoing of high-security electronic locks.

Michael Horowitz July 21, 2008 5:48 a.m. PT

The Last HOPE conference, now being held in New York City, is as much for people interested in hacking the real world as it is for computer techies.

One such real world presentation on Friday was called "Undoing Complexity--From Paper Clips to Ball Point Pens." Despite the title, it was about hacking high-security electronic locks from Medeco. (The paper clip in the title is a reference to using one as a way of bypassing one type of security in Medeco locks.) The presentation was very well attended, SRO in a large room.

The presenters, Matt Fiddler and Marc Tobias, didn't seem to hold a grudge. They said nice things about Medeco and its locks, which they claimed are used to protect the White House and England's royal family, among many other high value targets, such as server farms. But after 18 months of research, they claim to be able to hack into almost any Medeco high-security lock with ease. They also claimed to have had a good relationship with Medeco, until recently. Still, they must be Medeco's worst nightmare.

Much of the technical hacking details went over my head, but one thing came through loud and clear: don't trust the claims of vendors when it comes to the security of their locks. It was fascinating to hear how Medeco initially made a strong claim about its locks ability to resist one particular type of attack, then how it had to re-word that claim when that was proven untrue, and eventually, how it had to re-word the claim yet again to the point where it sounds good but has no real meaning at all.

Tobias was a guest, on the 2600 radio show Off The Hook on WBAI back on May 21. That show, is available for download here. He also spoke on "Lockpicking: Exploits for Mechanical Locks" at the prior HOPE conference. Audio of that talk is also available.

This Japanese 'anti-plague demon' has reemerged as a mascot against coronavirus

It even has its own pudding. Dig in.

Would you trust an anti-plague demon to suggest the best dessert?

Japanese companies, sports teams and government departments tend to use mascots to promote all kinds of weird stuff. Now, in the age of coronavirus, a 19th century "anti-plague demon" from Japanese folklore has been reborn as a mascot in the fight against the novel coronavirus.

It's even being used to help sell a new healthy type of dessert loaded with vitamin C. It'll hardly keep you safe from COVID-19, but it might help ward off a cold.

The mascot in question: A humanoid fish "yokai" ("demon" or "spirit") named Amabie.

Keep track of the coronavirus pandemic.

In 19th century Japanese folklore, Amabie lives off the coast of Kumamoto and often tells humans who see it, "Draw me and show to the people, so that you can be free from disease."

In the midst of the coronavirus pandemic, the demon Amabie has been making an appearance all over Japan, in many different forms. Amabie has reemerged as a mascot and internet meme used by artists, chefs and even the Japan's Health Ministry as a symbol of hope

Now Amabie is trying to get you to snack on "healthy" pudding from the Japanese company Nakauraya. The pudding is made in layers with yuzu citrus fruit jelly, and is apparently packed with vitamin C.

The pudding label art is a "lovely illustration so that you can feel relieved; we made it with the hope that you can regain your normal life as soon as possible," according to the Nakauraya website.

If you want to find more Japanese demon products, there's also Amabie IPA beer and adorable demon doughnuts.

Feeling extra adventurous? Add another Japanese delicacy to your Amabie pudding -- try dried murder hornets on as a topping.
